National Reconnaissance Office

The National Reconnaissance Office (NRO) is a unique agency with a very important mission: Building, launching, and operating our nation's intelligence satellites to protect American national security. Data collected from our satellites is used to inform our partners including military, Congress—even the President of the United States—to help them make critical, time-sensitive decisions. This data can be used to predict and monitor natural disasters and inform military operations around the globe. Millions of people depend on the NRO for critical information, and our organization is leading the way with some of the nation's top scientists, engineers, astrophysicists, intelligence officers, and military leaders. These talented men and women make us the best in the world at developing and operating satellites.
